Photoshop often seems intimidating. It can be frustrating to work with at first. However, with practice, even novices can quickly master the software and use it to create images that will truly amaze the world. Inserting the left elbow into the socket of a volleyball elbow. This study had three main aims: (i) to determine the prevalence of left elbow concomitant injuries to the radial head, coronoid, or both; (ii) to identify the most common radiologic causes of loss of elbow stability; and (iii) to evaluate the clinical and functional outcomes in a group of patients who had a lost of stability due to a left elbow concomitant injury. The medical records of 17 patients with a lateral collateral ligament (LCL) injury and concomitant soft tissue damage were retrospectively reviewed. Magnetic resonance (MR) images were evaluated for bony injuries and for intraarticular loose bodies or tendons. Functional outcome was assessed using the American Shoulder and Elbow Surgeons Elbow Assessment and the Modified Mayo Elbow Performance Index. A retrospective review of the medical records and evaluation of a pre- and postoperative MR study was done for each patient. Coronoid fractures were found in 44 % of patients and radial head fractures in 19 %. Ninety-six percent of patients were advised to avoid overhead throwing activities for at least 4 months, and 62 % were encouraged to use a forearm brace with a sling for 3 months. All patients underwent an inpatient rehabilitation program. Seventy-two percent of patients regained full range of elbow motion. MR images were normal in 43 % of patients. The most common patterns of LCL injuries were the tibial common, deltoid, and biceps lateral band. A greater number of different radiologic diagnoses were found in patients with a radial head fracture. The loss of stability of a left elbow can be caused by an injury to the LCL, coronoid, or both. The LCL is the most common injury and radial head fractures are the most prevalent of the concomitant injuries.

Regular follow-up is needed to detect late osteoarthritic changes as well as failure of the fixation of a displaced radial head fracture.
